

US–Iran Conflict Briefing

2026-10-07 · Morning edition · Issued 07:00 CDT

Oil Rises on Gulf Storm and Strait Tensions

- Brent rose to $101.51 a barrel and WTI to $90.25 on October 7, up roughly nine-tenths of a percent, as traders weighed a storm forming in the Gulf of Mexico — set to become the first Atlantic hurricane of 2026, threatening 15 percent of U.S. crude output and six refineries — against Houthi attacks on Saudi airports. — Reuters
- Roughly 12 million barrels per day of crude and 2 million barrels per day of refined products left the Middle East on tankers over the last seven to ten days, trading house Vitol's chief executive said, while Saudi Energy Minister Prince Abdulaziz bin Salman said supply was rising as the East-West pipeline reached 5.8 million barrels a day. — Reuters
- Kpler data shows crude flows through the Strait of Hormuz slipped to about 74 percent of prewar levels after the past week's tanker attacks, though alternative routes kept overall Gulf exports broadly at prewar levels. — WSJ

Blast Reported off Qeshm

- Iran's state news agency reported a blast heard from the sea near Qeshm Island, raising concerns of another flare-up in the conflict, according to ANZ Research analysts cited in the Journal's overnight markets wrap; the report had no independent confirmation as of early morning. — WSJ

Mecca Pact: Iran's Houthi Suggestion

- Ahead of Monday's emergency committee session in Riyadh, Pakistan's foreign minister said Iran had suggested engaging Yemen's Houthis politically following the group's attacks — a proposal the Saudi, Turkish and Pakistani committee members discussed. — Reuters

Markets

- Brent crude futures were quoted at $101.87 a barrel in the October 7 read; the Journal's same-day energy wire notes Brent up about six-tenths of a percent in early European trade on the Houthi airport strikes. — WSJ
